There are many pleasant surprises in this book. First, it is a collection of (I think) previously unpublished essays. I enjoy this approach especially when the material is autobiographical. I also am grateful that the author is so compassionate and truthful. Her honesty and kindness seem to spring from deliberate courage, and I find strength and determination for myself from her experiences. The prose is lively, witty, and casual, and always has a point.

This is my new go-to recommendation book for creatives looking for a boost. I loved every essay in here and found Sara very funny and poignant. Her look at the world of creativity and managing that on top of mental illness is great and she pulls few punches in her depictions of the good, the bad and the very ugly.

I loved this book. For the past couple of weeks it was my companion during my commute to and from the "day job." Reading it made me feel like I was sitting at a coffee shop across the table from Sara, as she was telling me these deep, wise, sometimes silly, heartfelt anecdotes and thoughts. Her advice never felt like words from someone who thinks she knows better. They were filled with the humility of someone who recognizes each person's experience is unique, yet the authority of someone who's "been there, done that". They felt like words of wisdom coming from a friend who cares. As an artist with day jobs, this book left me feeling like I am in great company.

This feels like the perfect book that I wish someone had given me to read when I was 25. Of course, I think Sara was also about 25 when I was 25, so she couldn't have written this yet. Nonetheless, my 25-year-old self yearns for this book...and my 40-year-old self loves it, too. It is warm, it comes from the heart, and it offers important and grounded advice about how to live well as a woman (especially a creative woman) in this crazy world of ours. I am grateful to Sara for writing it. And plan to give it as a gift to many of my girlfriends.

I love the title of this book which makes us all artists. I also especially like the essay "feel all your feelings" --empathetic and wise and sweet and honest with the occasional funny --all delivered with genuinely good advice.
